Surf's up in Provo Canyon

Several young men enjoy Tuesday's beautiful weather by trying a Utah version of surfing at the Murdock Diversion Dam on Provo River. They declined to reveal their names to a Daily Herald photographer since their actions were illegal and unsafe. Cooler days and nights in more days suitable for this kind of wet activity.

80. Pope said other researchers with questions about his study have contacted him and worked through accepted channels.

"I had one other individual hired to conduct a similar study. He called me. We talked about it. Ultimately, he basically confirmed my findings," shared Pope.

Pope will be out of town the day Lamm's work is to be presented at the U of U.

He said he feels he is being put at a disadvantage.

"I would like to see his evidence before I comment directly on his findings," he said.

In a release from Geneva Steel today, plant officials said, "It has not been nor is it now Geneva's intention to release the study until Professor Pope has had the opportunity to review it."

Pope explained that he used contital in Payson and out-of-county data that would have reflected a similar rise in influenza cases if that had been the correct diagnosis.

Pope said since his study more data has been collected and that is confusing but not overturning his original findings.

"It's essential that you take the time to do it right," said Pope. "It's an enormous effort to separate this out. It's not something that can be done quickly."

Geneva hired Lamm "several months ago," according to its press statement.

"When the article (Pope's study) was published, Geneva Steel officials became extremely concerned for the health of local residents. At that time we vowed to investigate the matter fully, to bring in the nation's top experts to review the data and the Pope Study and to make public any and all findings of other experts," said the statement.
